- ABSTRACT -

The Industrial Revolution had the most significant effect on Romantic Poetry because it served as a direct antithesis to the poet's subject matter during that time. The Industrial Revolution directly correlated with the horrible living conditions, wages far lower than what was required to have a decent living and the extortion of children through unfair labour that followed the industrialism led to the destruction of rural areas around the country as factories expanded and a higher influx of goods was demanded for production. In short, there was a major destruction of nature. Abuse of children, urbanization, and the destruction of nature led to many poets like John Keats, William Blake, William Wordsworth, and P.B. Shelley to make criticisms about the Revolution and call people to remember times before industrialism and urbanization swept across Great Britain.
